THE DISGUISE OF A DERVISH,
FROM THERIAN ACROSS THE TURKOMAN DESERT

TO KHIVA, BOKHARA AND SAMAR-

CAND, 1863.

By ARMINIUS VAMBERY.

Member of the Hungarian Academy of Pesth (by whom he was dispatched on this Scientific Mission).

With Map and Illustrations. $vo. Cloth, $3.75.

Mr. Vambery tells his story in a simple, unaffected manner, and yet, from the opening to the closing paragraph, he exercises a perfect spell over his readers. There is a reality about the scenes and places he describes that makes us feel as if we were one of his traveling companions. His doings are our dangers, his sufferings our sorrows. We feel keenly the want of water after a few days in the desert, and find ourselves behind the camel as the fearful sand storms are sweeping along. But what are want of meat and drink, surprises by robbers, sand storms, inextricable swamps, fatigue, and all the other thousand-and-one dangers and difficulties of the journey, to the terrible task imposed by the assumed disguise! For ten long months we must wear a mask. Nedly, not even those who have given the strongest proofs of attachment to us, must know that we are Franks. Every word, action or action of ours must be unreal. Our "make-up" must be perfect, and without any previous rehearsal we are expected to take a leading part in a farce which at any moment may develop into a serious tragedy. To dispense our public by any awkwardness in our action would be followed by our condemnation—our certain death.

[London Reader.]

Arminius Vambery returns from a country where he has regarded as impudent, to ask us a crime, and to take notes as to deadly sin; in which he was obliged to deposit himself in the character of a dervish, and to return his blessing for any kindness he received.—[London Times.]
